

Author name: Name suppressed

Date of submission: Saturday, 2 November 2024

Your submission for this review:

I fully appreciate that the infrastructure needs increasing and aging assets replacing which results in cashflow being required. However, deciding that Pricing is to increase for existing homes due to new homes being built is insane. That's like charging someone more for a car they already have because the manufacturer is building more cars to sell to meet demand! The cost to fund the new homes should be on the development and first time purchasing of the homes and not back to the existing customers. The government should also be controlling or regulating this. The pricing increases in 5 years time (which will pass very quickly) is astronomical. Any increases should be more on usage than fixed fees so that there's ways for people to attempt to reduce costs by reducing their usage. There's no incentive to change habits in the current structure and is, well, a lazy way to do it.